control, cultural-scientific exchanges, the establishment of global peace and free and fair trade.

I would suggest that we should communicate to the Soviets our desire for a genuine improvement in human rights and for frank exchanges on various issues that each side feels uncomfortable about. Instead of displaying a passive and cynical attitude about changes in the USSR and saying "we should applaud perestroika but not finance it," we should offer to finance mutually beneficial projects. At the same time, we should point out some obvious inconsistencies of reforms politely, but often.

I can give dozens of examples that are related to Soviet meddling in the Middle East, Latin America, Africa and Asia. A couple are critical tests of the sincerity of the Soviet revolutionary change that is under way in Gorbachev's Soviet Union. There are the past human rights violations committed by the USSR against individual citizens (Communist and non-Communist) in Soviet dominated Eastern Europe. Eventually, the rehabilitation of those victims must be made. In addition, the Soviet Union invaded or threatened several Eastern European countries. Why does not Gorbachev apologize to those countries as Krushchev apologized to Tito's Yugoslavia in 1955? How about rehabilitating the victims of the Katyn forest in Poland, Dubcek and other Czech communists who were predecessors of Soviet "perestroika" and "glasnost"? Weren't they also victims of Stalin's and Brezhnev's "misguided policies"?

We should wish the people of the Soviet Union success in their struggle to catch up with many human rights that were denied to them for decades by Stalin and Brezhnev. The United States should also pursue a two-track policy: negotiate many bilateral or multilateral military and nonmilitary issues with the Soviets, while establishing a joint negotiating front with our European allies under the auspices of the Helsinki Accords. The latter is the only existing East-West legal agreement to provide detailed procedures for dealing efficiently with various military and human rights problems at regular annual East-West meetings. This should become the major avenue of peace and cooperation.
